A total of 150 students rated the class. Out of those, only 89 students commented on whether or not the instructor encouraged student contact and communication. 8 out of 28 students who were dissatisfied with the class did not leave comments, and 48 out of 122 satisfied students did not leave comments.

Overall, 24 out of 89 total responses mentioned that the professor didn't encourage student communication in any way.

For those that were extremely dissatisfied, nearly half (4 out of 9) responded that the instructor did nothing to encourage student to student communication.

Likewise, 8 out of 19 unsatisfied (not satisfied) students commented that the instructor did nothing.

Out of the satisfied students, only 10 out of 79 students responded that the professor did nothing to encourage communication; with the extremely satisfied students, the responses were 2 out of 43.

Discussion forums were mentioned 33 times by students. It was mentioned the most by those students who were extremely satisfied (15 mentions) followed closely by the satisfied students (14) and then finally the unsatisfied students (4).

Email was commented on 16 times, but only among the students who were happy with the class - 7 by the extremely satisfied students and 9 by the satisfied students.

Group work was also mentioned by the respondents at total of 10 times. The satisfied students mentioned it the most (6), while the unsatisfied students mentioned it 3 times and the extremely satisfied students mentioned it 1 time.

There appears to be a positive correlation between the students who are satisfied with the DL class and the students who mentioned the use of discussion forums, groups, and emails.

People who were very unhappy with the class didn't mention any use of the forums, group work, or email contact.

Class presentations, student contact lists, and in-class work time were all mentioned less than three times.
